Dear Spectrum,

Now that Fox News has been publicly exposed, it is time to rethink the access you give them to the general public.

Through their own admissions and the documentation Fox News provided in the Dominion defamation case, Fox News openly admitted that they lied and misrepresented the facts for the expressed purpose of keeping profits high. As Rupert Murdoch said, "It's not about red or blue, it's about green."

Now that everyone but their viewers know the truth, it is time for you to reevaluate the free access you give them. At the very least, Fox News should not be part of the basic package you offer to your clients. At the very least, Spectrum should make Fox News a premium option at an extra cost for those who insist on being lied to. Even better, you could opt to drop them completely as a bogus news organization.

Now that they have been legally exposed for who they are and how they operate, providing them free access in the marketplace makes Spectrum complicit in spreading their deceptions and promoting their disinformation campaign. The proof they provided to the court cannot be simply ignored on your part. To give them the same access they have now is to say that your organization is unconcerned about the ethical and political effects, thus making Spectrum responsible for understanding its role in promoting these fabrications and libels.

Faithful Fox News viewers will obviously be offended by the responsible move to change the status of the network. They will likely complain that all news organizations broadcast disinformation. So when these other news organizations have been legally exposed for such behaviors through testimony, affidavits, company records and personal correspondence, it will be time to treat them in just the same way.

It is time for Fox News to be held accountable and for public communications corporations to address their culpability in promoting disinformation for profit.

Sincerely,
